Roadmarks is a science fantasy novel by American author Roger Zelazny, written during the late 1970s and published in 1979. The novel postulates a road that travels through time, with a nexus placed every few years where a handful of specially gifted people are able to get on and off.

~~Roadmarks - Wikipedia~~

Roadmarks is a fragmented, experimental type of SF novel, tied together by a Road (with a capital R) that leads to all times and places and alternative timestreams in our world's history, for those who know how to navigate it (a certain German named Adolph briefly pops up in an early chapter, eternally searching for the timeline where he won).

Although Zelazny is probably best remembered for his highly entertaining Amber fantasy series, Roadmarks is significantly more sophisticated in its approach. To begin with it's not totally clear what is going on - in a good way. You just have to go with the flow as you go from chapter 2 to chapter 1, then the next chapter 2.

Roadmarks' original title was "The Last Exit to Babylon", but the publisher declined it, so it became a part of the cover illustration instead. One of the best-known novels by Zelazny, Roadmarks is a rather short and seemingly unprepossessing, ending in less than 200 pages. As do most of Zelazny's books, one might add ;). Roger Zelazny, as befits a poet, was a great believer in ...

The late great Roger Zelazny is famed for enigmatic little fables that play with familiar notions like time and space while not exactly handing you pat answers about either. Roadmarks is such a tale. It's a dreamlike concoction that takes place along a highway that stretches through time rather than place.

Roadmarks is one of Zelazny's minor novels - pleasant, but not particularly striking. While I'm not a fan of time travel stories, here Zelazny uses the time road mainly as a setting, not a plot driver, and blurs the usual problems with a little alternate, merging timelines handwaving. There's a bit of an unsupported ending as well. The problem for Roadmarks, though, is the characters ...
